IPDeskBox is an icon application that shows the IP address of your local network computer (and Internet). It can also be configured for a domain (that is, it shows the IP address of your computer in the domain) or an IP address (that is, it shows the IP address of the computer in the network). This program identifies the IP address of the physical Internet Protocol (IP) on the network interface cards of the computer and displays the associated IP address on the desktop. It also displays the IP address of the host computer and the IP address of the host computer on the Internet.

Network Address Translation - LAN Address Translation (NAT) is a technique used to increase the security on internal network by hiding the real IP address of the computer on a sub-network from the outside world. In this mode, also referred to as local address preservation or address hiding or Network Address and Port Translation (NAPT), the real IP address of the computer is retained on the LAN; but its port number is changed and is indicated in the headers sent over the network. When NAT is disabled, all addresses (ports) are visible; but when it is enabled, it operates like a firewall and is able to keep IP packets from being relayed from private to public sub-networks. To alleviate the impact of security holes on private networks, NAT was designed to hide behind routers the computers that are making the TCP/IP messages to/from the Internet. In this way, only the intended computers and IP addresses on the internet will be able to speak to each other. Network Address Translation (NAT) was implemented in the routing protocols in IPv4 . The NAT standard IPv6 is evolving and is expected that networking products will support NAT as well. NAT translation allows a computer to be identified by its IP address (it uses an IP address only, not a full TCP/IP network address) and to communicate over the Internet using the same IP address as when communicating with local IP address computers. NAT is mandatory on the Internet when using a single computer to connect to the Internet through a 09e8f5149f
